MARCH 2009: A CELEBRATION OF 20 YEARS OF THE WEB
World Wide Web@20

1990 was a momentous year in world events. In February, Nelson Mandela was freed after 27 years in prison. In April, the space shuttle Discovery carried the Hubble Space Telescope into orbit. And in October, Germany was reunified.
Then at the end of 1990, a revolution took place that changed the way we live today.

CERN, the European Organization for Nuclear Research, is where it all began in March 1989. A physicist, Tim Berners-Lee, wrote a proposal for information management showing how information could be transferred easily over the Internet by using hypertext, the now familiar point-and-click system of navigating through information. The following year, Robert Cailliau, a systems engineer, joined in and soon became its number one advocate.

Tim Berners-Lee followed his

The idea was to connect hypertext with the Internet and personal computers, thereby having a single information network to help CERN physicists share all the computer-stored information at the laboratory. Hypertext would enable users to browse easily between texts on web pages using links. The first examples were developed on NeXT computers.

Berners-Lee created a browser-editor with the goal of developing a tool to make the Web a creative space to share and edit information and build a Mark Zuckerberg I'm in India this week for vacation. I'll be attending a good friend's wedding and checking out a few cities while I'm here.

Mark Zuckerberg For those wondering, I set most of my content on my personal Facebook page to be open so people could see it. I set some of my content to be more private, but I didn't see a need to limit visibility of pics with my friends, family or my teddy bear :)

Data, Not Design, Is King in the Age of Google

Noah Berger for The New York Times

Douglas Bowman left his position as top visual designer at Google and said that designs there lived or died by data on consumer responses. He now is creative director at Twitter.

By MIGUEL HELFT
Published: May 9, 2009

CAN a company blunt its innovation edge if it listens to its customers too closely? Can its products become dull if they are tailored to match exactly what users say they want? These questions surfaced recently when Douglas Bowman, a top visual designer, left Google.

Web Design

adj., fresh-est
Novel; different: a fresh slant on the problem.

Who Am I?

FRESHEST is a small web design company based in Northern Ireland. When I say small I actually mean just me, Bill Morrison. I have been designing webs for about six years now. Please do get in touch if you have a web design project you would like me to work on.

What I Do?

I like to build very simple and effective sites. I believe that web sites should be easy to use, and good to look at. All the sites that I build use valid HTML, CSS, with a little PHP and MySQL where needed. The last site I designed was White Image, an online gallery exhibiting and selling Irish art.

DAN CONAWAY
COMMUNICATION STRATEGY

Big results from big ideas, all for a little scratch.

Wake Somebody Up.

I'm Dan Conaway.

I've worked for several ad agencies, owned a couple, held down every agency management job there is, and reinvented how some of them are done.

What you're probably paying your agency a fortune for now, I'll do for chicken feed.

RECENT PROJECTS

What I've done for somebody lately. Fighting crime, promoting boychoirs and financial literacy, moving things around the world, gathering industrial dreck, and inviting the living to hear the stories of the dead. Might be something I could do for you. Read More.

CONSULTING

Be heard. Whether you call it marketing, advertising and public relations ... or promotion, positioning and branding ... or skywriting ... you want people to listen when your name is called. And to understand the message. Send the right one. Read More.

RANTING

Let's be perfectly clear. I've written some unusual things, and shared an opinion or 2,000. Here are a few, and stay tuned for those to come. In fact, I feel one coming on right now ... but that might just be indigestion. A little rambling. A little raging. A little random. Read More.
